“There’s no place like home.” How many times has that proverb been used in essays and speeches? Is the proverb so worn out at this point that its meaning is lost? People would admit that they have a special link with their native place. They would say that the place had, and has, an influence on their personality and outlook. But is a love for a native place fitting in the modern world?

Where you are from and where you live are not the same. Where you live is where you have settled down at present, and where you are from is where you were born and reared. Your native place stays in your heart, where you live goes when you move house. How many Irish people who have settled in foreign countries for years and years haven’t lost their Irish identity? How many people have settled in the big cities of this country for years but still support their native county in GAA games? All of them, perhaps.
